The subject matter disclosed herein relates generally to fluid delivery systems and, more particularly, to fluid delivery systems that can be used during stent deployment. Stents are used for a variety of medical applications. For example, stents are used for treatment of atherosclerotic stenosis in blood vessels, and have been proven useful in treating not only restenosis following angioplasty, but also vascular disease and other conditions. In certain procedures, a stent may be deployed into a blood vessel in a non-expanded condition and then expanded. The stent may be configured to be self-expanding or pressure expandable. The expansion may occur using a balloon or other expansion mechanism. For example, the stent may be deployed and then the balloon inflated to apply a radial force on the stent and expand the stent to a desired diameter. Once expanded, the balloon may be deflated and removed. Various difficulties may be encountered during deployment of stents into a patient. For example, a stent may be placed on a catheter and delivered to a desired treatment site within a patient. Depending upon the size of the vessel and the lesion to be treated, the stent may be placed in the vascular system as part of a single step procedure or the stent delivery system may be placed at a later time and deployed at that time. If the stent delivery system is placed at a later time, e.g., when the vessel is collapsed, it can be difficult to attach the stent to the delivery catheter and then deliver the stent to the lesion within the vessel. Further, stents have to be carefully matched to the vessel being treated to avoid stent migration or compression between delivery and deployment. During deployment, the stent may have to be compressed and then released to deploy. A
